During the late 1960s, the term "Black Capitalism" entered the national vocabulary. This was one aspect of an unprecedented contemporary interest in black business development. In succeeding decades, not only has the term "Black Capitalism" all but disappeared from usage, but many historic black enterprises have, likewise, disappeared from the landscape of American business. This presentation will explore some of the factors that have contributed to the marginalization of black business enterprise in late twentieth and early twenty-first century America.
